

I'm Passionate about Ag

My name is Trinitie Beres, and I grew up on a mixed farm operation, running a small herd of purebred Simmentals and breeding horses. Agriculture has been woven into my life since the very beginning. My passion for agriculture started when I was just a toddler playing with my pony. As I grew older, that early life developed into a strong interest in riding and eventually found a passion for dressage. When I was ten years old, I joined 4-H and my passion for cattle grew. Since then, livestock has constantly played a central role in my daily life, and it is important to me that I continue to be involved in agriculture, as I pursue my future goals.

From a very young age, I knew I wanted to become a veterinarian, and that ambition has never changed. My passion for livestock has only strengthened this dream and given it purpose. Over the years, I have watched countless veterinary procedures, ranging from horses colicing to calving emergencies, and each experience has shown me how essential veterinarians are to the wellbeing of both animals and the farmers who depend on them. No matter the time of day or the severity of the situation, veterinarians are always just a phone call away, ready to help in moments of urgency. Witnessing their dedication has inspired me to become someone farmers can rely on.

With the growing of the shortage of large animal veterinarians in the province, I feel an even stronger responsibility to pursue this path. I want to be part of the solution to this challenge and help ensure that livestock producers have access to the care they need. My family is fortunate to live in an area with a strong team of large animal veterinarians, but I know that this is not the case for many farmers. Rural producers often face longer wait times and limited access to veterinary services, which can have serious consequences for their operations. I want to support these rural communities and help bridge the gap in veterinary care so that all farmers can receive timely reliable assistance.

Agriculture has shaped who I am, and it continues to guide the future I am working towards. My experiences with livestock, my involvement in 4-H, and my upbringing on a mixed farm have all contributed to my desire to serve the agriculture community. Becoming a veterinarian is not just a career choice for me, it is a commitment to the people, animals, and rural communities that have influenced my life.
